

Parole Programs

When a youth is released from a residential facility, he or she is placed on parole supervision if the youth is a high risk offender, has sexually offended, has graduated from the Basic Training Camp Program or was convicted of certain Auto theft offenses.

Functional Family Parole (FFP), our model of transition, reentry and parole aftercare, involves the family in reintegration of youth into their communities. A key goal in FFP is to help families improve how they work together. This is accomplished by helping families support and reinforce their son or daughter in the positive changes made and the skills learned while the youth was in the residential facility. Families are "motivated and engaged" and linked to services such as counseling, mentoring, mental health treatment, substance abuse treatment. Contact the Business Manager at:

DSHS Juvenile Rehabilitation Administration

JRA purchasing opportunities for businesses

"JRA is committed to increasing contracting and procurement opportunities for minority and women owned business enterprises."

The DSHS Juvenile Rehabilitation Administration serves Washington state's highest risk youth. After criminal convictions, the youth are committed to JRA custody for prescribed sentences by a county juvenile court.

Institutions

Youth committed by a juvenile court to JRA are reviewed and placed at one of four secure institutions. The youth are assessed for treatment, safety, and health needs and placed in the appropriate living unit. Most youth attend full time school operated by the local school district and are involved in recreation, vocational, and behavioral treatment programs.

Each institution also provides specialty programming for youth who have sexually offended, youth with chemical dependency issues, and three of the institutions have programs for highly aggressive youth.

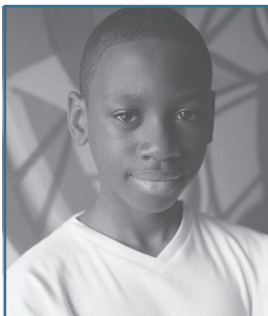

Youth in residential programs range in age from 10 to 20.
